

Most impressive moment

After Anuntin was elected as Thailand's new prime minister, I was surprised and certainly impressed because of how the now present prime minister won without even being close. For him to gather a total of 311 votes when all he needed was 247 is an impressive feat by itself. What makes this situation more interesting was how he was still capable of winning all those votes despite all the political conflicts he and his party had gone through. This moment truly stood out to me the most since anuntin was able to unite multiple parties to help support him even those who were once his opposition. Not only does it take great courage in announcing a plan to hold a general election within four months but it certainly takes strong negotiation skills to be able to achieve this moment. This moment goes to highlight that Anuntin is someone many Thai citizens and other political leaders view as one who is both capable and able to be relied on as reflected in his political victory.

Most disappointing moment

Despite the impressive result of the election, I think one of the most disappointing moment from this election was the neglect of us Thai citizens who didn't get to have a say in this. It felt like the presence of our people's voice was lacking in this election because it wasn't an ordinary election, it was an election held in the parliament. So, despite the fact that there may be some good effects with Anuntin as the new prime minister, it is quite disappointing how Thai citizens were sidelined this time with little say in choosing the new prime minister.

The future implications of Thai politics

As of right now, I believe that Thailand is in a stable state. While this stability is only temporary, it helps put Thai society at ease for the time being. However, the future is somewhat unclear as there are plans to hold a new election in 4 months, therefore it only feels like a temporary fix rather than solving the problem entirely. So new implications may rise when that time comes.

Futhurmore, part of Anuntin's uprising is also due to the alliances he formed with the other parties. It is possible he may give in to their demands in the future instead of the demands of those who helped him, causing more trouble within the political system.