

1. The most impressive moment for me was when Anutin gave his speech after being confirmed as PM. He showed confidence and promised to bring back stability. I was also surprised by how he managed to get support from the People's Party even though they used to be rivals. It shows that political negotiation still plays a big role in Thai politics.

2. The most disappointing moment was realizing that we're still stuck in a cycle of political instability. We've had three PMs in less than two years, and I don't feel confident this one will last either. It seems like the government is still weak and may not be able to make real changes.

3. In the next few months, I think there will be more protests and political pressure. Anutin said he plans to dissolve Parliament in four months, which means we will have another election soon. Until then, I think things will remain tense, and there might be conflict inside the government and among the people.
