

Today 'PM selection

Question 1

In my opinion , the most impressive moment for me is when Rangsiman Rome questioned why some political parties accepted all proposals from the People's Party if those proposals were deemed unconstitutional, criticizing them for inconsistency after the party failed to advance. I was impressed because Mr. Rangsiman showed the courage to point out unfairness and inconsistency in politics, which made me feel he truly values honesty and accountability.

Question 2

“Cholnan” slammed the People's Party for giving 14 million votes to the 1 million votes of the Bhumjaithai Party, questioning how the country can be properly governed. He pointed out that if “Anutin” is chosen as Prime Minister, it would be seen as accepting the dominance of extra-parliamentary powers, and he warned that this would mark the beginning of the end of the parliamentary system. I was disappointed with what Cholnan said because his words are very strong and create tension, especially by blaming the People's Party. They focus on criticizing without offering solutions and may make people feel hopeless about Thai politics, reducing trust in democracy.

Question 3

Thai politics is going through a big shift now that Mr. Anutin Charnvirakul has been picked as the 32nd Prime Minister. The Shinawatra family doesn't have as much influence as before, and the Bhumjaithai Party is likely running the show for now. Mr. Anutin has said he'll dissolve parliament and call new elections in four months, which could give opposition parties, especially the People's Party, a chance to gain more support. People are also talking about changing the constitution, which might shake things up politically and push for more democracy. Even so, the situation is still quite unstable, with pressure from different political groups and the public, so the future of Thai politics is still very uncertain.