

1. The moment that the People's party senators all collectively voted for Anutin Charnvirakul as prime minister as agreed in the MOA, counting at 143 votes stroke me as the most impressive moment, as it shows the unity in the party and the collective objective to bring about the amendments of the year 2560 constitution which can be considered the root of many problems in politics today, including complications with prime ministers.
2. The many speeches Pheu Thai party's senators gave that blamed the People's party for agreeing to vote Anutin as prime minister evokes disappointment in me. Senators expressed frustration in the People's party's distrust of their party, yet failed to acknowledge what caused that distrust.
3. The parliament has selected Anutin Charnvirakul to be the new prime minister today. I wish to keep an optimistic outlook and believe that in the next few months, in Thai politics, the parliament will ultimately be dissolved for a new election. As well as the amending of the year 2560 constitution
