

What was the most impressive moment for you, and why?

The moment when Chalerm Yubamrung, a senior figure from the Pheu Thai Party, publicly supported Anutin Charnvirakul for Prime Minister — despite his party being in opposition — is considered the most impressive moment of today's Thai PM election because his action showed political independence and willingness to act against party lines — something rare in Thai parliamentary politics.

What was the most disappointing moment for you, and why?

The most disappointing moment in today's Thai Prime Minister election — both symbolically and politically — was the absence of meaningful opposition unity or resistance, especially from the Pheu Thai Party. There was no real fight from the opposition.

What do you think will happen in Thai politics over the next few months according to the outcome of today's house meeting?

After today's vote, Thailand's politics will likely go through big changes. Anutin Charnvirakul is now the new Prime Minister, and he promised to hold new elections in about four months and let people vote on changing the constitution. The old political group linked to the Shinawatra family lost power and is now much weaker. But Anutin's government doesn't have full support in parliament, so it might be hard for him to lead smoothly. In the next few months, there could be lots of political talks, protests, and calls for more democracy and fairness in the system.
