

What's the (hell) PM selection today?

What was the most impressive moment for you, and why?

Political parties managed to strike a deal that allowed political deadlock to move forward. The unexpected alliance between the People's Party and the Bhumjaithai party demonstrated the ability of Thai politicians to negotiate and reach compromises in times of uncertainty leading to a new chance to restructure the political system which can be seen as a new hope for Thailand.

What was the most disappointing moment for you, and why?

Despite the positive elements, the result of the selection was also disappointing. The biggest concern lies in the fact that the new Prime Minister has a controversial past. Anutin has previously faced allegations of corruption and media-shareholding violations, and although these cases have been resolved legally, the lingering perception remains negative to many Thais. Moreover, in the eyes of many citizens or international observers, he does not represent the ideal image of a national leader according to his past that raises doubts about the government's ethical standards.

What do you think will happen in Thai politics over the next few months according to the outcome of today's house meeting?

From the outcome of Thailand's 32nd Prime Minister on September 5, 2025, Thailand's political environment is likely to remain fragile over the next few months. The new government described as a caretaker will face immense pressure for constitutional reform and a parliamentary dissolution. If Anutin and his colleagues deliver on these promises, political tension may pave the way for a new election that restores legitimacy to the system. However, if the government delays or appears to maneuver for prolonged power, public frustration and protest will be significantly increased.
