

What was the most impressive moment for you, and why?

The most impressive moment was when the Speaker announced the final tally of votes and the chamber filled with a strange mix of clapping, nodding, and silence. It wasn't just numbers being read it felt like a collective exhale after weeks of uncertainty. I noticed some faces soften in relief while others tighten in expression. For me, the power of that moment was in its clarity the chaos of debate dissolved into a single outcome, and everyone, whether joyful or bitter, had to accept it.

What was the most disappointing moment for you, and why?

The most disappointing moment came not from what was said, but from the emptiness between speeches, the way some members avoided eye contact, scrolling their phones, or whispering behind raised hands while the future of leadership was being decided. It felt like a reminder that even in such a historic moment, detachment can begin to slowly creep in. That scene disappointed me because it showed how routine politics can diminish the weight of decisions that shape millions of lives.

What do you think will happen in Thai politics over the next few months, according to the outcome of today's House meeting?

From the mood in the room, I imagine the next few months will be a balancing act like walking across a rope bridge that sways with every gust of wind. There was relief in the chamber, but not joy rather order, but not unity. That tells me the country may move forward, but on fragile ground. The new prime minister's calm demeanor seemed to reassure some, yet the undercurrent of tension in whispered side conversations made me think challenges are already lining up. I believe the coming months will be less about celebration and more about whether this fragile sense of stability can hold steady.
