

1.The most impressive moments

The most impressive moment for me was the speech of the People's Party before the prime minister vote. Their leader made it clear that they were not simply making a deal, but standing firm on principles. They supported Anutin only under strict conditions: that parliament must be dissolved within four months, that there must be real progress on constitutional reform, and that Bhumjaithai would remain a minority government. What impressed me was the courage to speak directly about giving power back to the people, instead of joining the government for personal benefit. As a Thai citizen, it gave me hope that some politicians are still willing to fight for democracy and listen to the people's voice.

2. The most Disappointing moment

I feel disappointed that Thai politics is still very unstable. In just two years, our country has already changed prime ministers three times. This constant change makes it hard for Thailand to move forward. What concerns me the most is that the decision of who leads the country does not really come from the citizens, but from political deals inside parliament. As a Thai citizen, I hope that one day we can break this cycle and build a system where the people's voice truly decides the future of our nation.

3. Future of Thai Politics

Looking forward, I think Thai politics in the next few months will be very unstable. Even though Anutin won, his government will not be very strong, and he will have to bargain with many groups to stay in power. At the same time, the People's Party and young reformist voices will keep demanding changes to the constitution and pushing for new elections. As a citizen, I feel there is a high chance of street protests if reforms don't happen quickly.

But I also see hope. This political crisis shows that change is possible and that the younger generation is not afraid to speak out. Even though the future feels uncertain, I believe it could also be the start of a new conversation about democracy and fairness in Thailand
