

Before we get to implement, use, or weaponise “motivation”, we first have to understand what motivation is, and what are theories related to it.

The word Motivation derived from Latin “Movere”, meaning “to move”. As the meaning evolve, motivation is the willingness to exert high levels of effort toward a goal. And as there’re concepts, there’re theories related to it.

The main theories of motivation can be categorised in to two part: 1) Content Theories, and 2) Process Theories. To quickly understand the core concept of each theory type: The Content Theories identify the needs that motivate people’s behaviour, while The Process Theories mainly focus on the thought processes that act to motivate people’s behaviour.

The widely spread Content Theories are:

1. Maslow’s Hierarchy of Needs:

Basic physiological needs to self-actualisation and transcendence.

2. Herzberg’s Two-Factor Theory:

- Hygiene Factor (e.g., salary, work conditions) prevent dissatisfaction.
- Motivators (e.g., achievement, recognition) drive satisfaction.

3. McClelland’s Acquired Needs Theory:

- The Need for Achievement, Affiliation, and Power.

4. McGregor’s Theory X and Theory Y:

- Theory X: People dislike work and need control.
- Theory Y: People are self-motivated and seek responsibility.

and the widely known Process Theories are:

1. Expectancy Theory by V. Vroom:

$$\text{Motivation} \equiv \text{Expectancy} \times \text{Instrumentality} \times \text{Valence}.$$

2. Equity Theory by J.S. Adams:

Motivation is influenced by perceived fairness in input–output ratios.

3. Goal Setting Theory by Edwin A. Locke & Gary P. Latham:

Specific, challenging goals with feedback enhance performance.

4. Reinforcement Theory by B.F. Skinner:

Behavior is shaped by rewards and punishments.

By understanding Motivation Theories, we can better understand what drives employees from different cultures, and improve Cross-Cultural Management within the organisation. Moreover, we can apply Motivation Theories to enhance employees engagement by understood their value, and opinion. For example:

Managing a Diverse Team Project:

- By using Expectancy Theory.
 - Set Clear Goal (Expectancy)
 - Set Transparent Reward System (Instrumentality)
 - Reward the member (Valence)

As you can see from the demonstration above, by implementing Motivation Theory, we can improve the workplace management, and enhance employee's engagement,
